THIS is an attempt to give a connected view of the question respecting the abolition of the slave trade; a question which nearly concerns the whole community. If, as the advocates for slavery affirm, the very being of the state be bound up with the continuation of it; or if, as the friends of abolition maintain, it be impolitic and unprofitable; if it wounds every human feeling, and steels the heart against every benevolent affection; if it encourages every corrupt principle among the people, and threatens the nation with vengeance from above; then must it be deliberately examined, and dispassionately discussed. Those especially whose voices must decide, will carefully inquire, and cautiously search into, the merits of the cause. The friends of abolition solicit only for a full and fair hearing, to gain the object of their wishes. For the good sense of Parliament will not find the genuine feelings of humanity, and the sound dictates of prudence at variance.

I shall only remark one disadvantage under which the cause of humanity labours. The advocates for slavery being interested in the issue, are industrious in making good their cause. They are numerous, united, and powerful. They can refer to calculations, combinations, returns, bring forward evidence of any sort, or rank, in any number. Those who stand forth to act as the friends of the slaves, are a few private individuals, themselves volunteers in the business, who must fish out proofs of the things which they want to establish, from dark hints, from casual information, from timid reluctant witnesses. Even very important information must continue suppressed, because they are unwilling to expose individuals to the powerful resentment of their adversaries. These circumstances throw a lustre on those who, disregarding personal considerations, have come boldly forward, and exposed the foul deeds of avarice and tyranny. And though proofs ought not to be expected, where proofs cannot be had, unless they could be forced out of those who think it their interest to withhold them, yet providentially every fact necessary for the Legislature to found an opinion on, has been established by unexceptionable eye-witnesses, to a surprising degree of accuracy, in a wonderful and unexpected manner. But were our proofs found less full and convincing, I trust those who seriously peruse the following pages, will see enough in this collection of contradictory objections, on which to form a very decisive conclusion. For example, it is said, that negroes are miserable in Africa; yet Africa is so prolific, as to require emigration to make room for its inhabitants. Again, slaves are happy in the sugar colonies; yet require annual supplies to keep up their numbers. Can all this be reconciled to common sense? Can it be the cause of truth, which requires such contradictory assertions to establish it.
INTRODUCTION.

THE following Objections to the Abolition of the Slave Trade, with Answers, were intended to give a summary view of that subject. These objections being collected from various persons and writings, there will be found in them no small degree of contradiction, for which the collector is not answerable. But whatever they may be, they have all been advanced by different people, in conversation and writings, with a view to produce an effect on persons who have not studied the subject; and they are therefore necessarily brought together here, to be separately examined and weighed. If every answer be not found equally conclusive, the candid reader will remember that it is a single person who endeavours to give him a view of a very extensive subject, which takes in a variety of considerations.

Since this plan was resolved on, a publication has appeared in favour of the slave trade, which, coming at once fairly to the question, claims a particular attention. It is entitled, Considerations on the Emancipation of the Negroes, and on the Abolition of the Slave Trade, by a West Indian Planter; and is affirmed by the Monthly Reviewers to be invincible, on political grounds.*

* This they have since candidly retracted.
I shall first observe, that where this author treats of a general or partial emancipation of slaves, he combats a shadow; because the present plan aims only at the abolition of the African slave trade. It meddles not with slaves already in the colonies; if it did, that sympathy, which first incited me to plead their claim to better treatment, would force me to range myself on the author’s side, and protest against the indiscreet measure. All our slaves are not yet generally in a state, wherein full liberty would be a blessing. Like children, they must be restrained by authority, and led on to their own good. But it would be insidious not to declare that humanity looks forward to full emancipation, whenever they shall be found capable of making a proper use of it. But this may be left to the master’s discretion, and the effect of future arrangements, which even the planter acknowledges to be necessary. He who can procure a freeman to work for him, will never employ a slave; for the first does twice the work of the other; and when he dies, his place is supplied in the natural course of generation, not at an enormous expense from the slave-market. See my Essay, p. 118, &c. In Pennsylvania, where slaves are farther advanced in civilization, the Quakers have tried this experiment with the most complete success. Among many others, one man has freed 100 slaves, and finds his work better done and his profits greater, for having divested himself of this unnatural property. Indeed, what doth a peasant reap from his labour, which a slave ought not to receive? food, raiment, and necessaries, to enable him to raise up labourers for his employers. But there is a confidence, a charm in liberty.
liberty, that doubles his exertion, and softens its toil. While increasing his employer's wealth, he provides for his family, and when his task is finished, his time is his own; no capricious tyrant intermeddles with his joy. Farther, the British legislature should be cautious how it meddles with the state of slaves in the colonies, lest, while attempting to regulate their treatment, it confirm the bonds of slavery. If regulations be necessary, the island assemblies should enforce them. While Britain gives them a monopoly of her sugar market, she will always preserve a check over them. But if emancipation be not intended, the claim to the compensation of £60,000,000 connected page 5, with it, is cut off. We have only to consider how far the abolition of the slave trade will affect the planter's property, in such a manner as shall entitle him to compensation. But the argument rests on a foundation, that I trust will not be allowed: he says, page 3, "That the planterpossesses a political right to his slave, whatever may be his moral right, and must be paid according to the slave's value, before his right can be extinguished by restoring the slave to his natural freedom." This plea is not good. A horse has been fairly bought in an open market, established by authority; but he had been stolen, and the right owner discovers and claims him, and the thief is gone off. Must the right owner repay the fair purchaser his price; or will this last be allowed to keep him? Still a horse is an object of property, but when the question is fairly agitated, I deny that a man can ever be an object of property, except in the case of an atrocious crime, which applies not to one slave in a thousand, and excludes excludes all children *. The act that reduces a man to slavery, is illegal and unjust; for it is impossible for a slave to receive a compensation for his liberty.

A band of robbers may agree, in stealing horses for each man to keep those seized by him. This is binding on them, but not on the right owner whenever he can assert his claim. In like manner, one slave-holder may prescribe against another slave-holder, for the use of a slave; but he can make out no right when humanity lays in his claim; nor can he demand compensation. Still whatever be the claims of humanity here they are not enforced. In whatever manner the planter has acquired his slaves, no person intends to disturb him in the quiet possession. We only aim to prevent his dealing in them, as far as it encourages robbers and murderers to carry on an inhuman traffic in the bodies of our fellow-creatures which, as we shall plainly shew, will ultimately only ruin himself, if he perseveres in it. And can he come in such a case to government for relief and say, Hitherto I have been allowed to buy from man-stealers, wretched slaves to toil without recompence, without food, without clothing for my profit; if you take this privilege from

* Even in this case, a slave must be considered and be kept as a slave to the publick. No private person can acquire right over him. For if slavery be adjudged as a punishment to be just, it must neither be less nor more than the crime deserves. If less, the society, which is offended, is injured, if more the culprit: for no authority can effectually interpose between a master and his slave. And this reasoning holds still stronger against the custom of selling culprits to foreigners over whom the authority that condemned them cannot be exercised, either to enforce or relax the punishment, that should or may be inflicted.
me, on which I have depended, on which I have hazarded my fortune, you must make good all my losses as I shall state them, even to the amount of £60,000,000?

The case is fairly stated, murder and robbery are not on this subject exaggerated terms. The nature thereof cannot be explained without them. And can "a political right" be opposed to this reasoning? Can the planter's property be preserved to him, only by means that the feeling heart shrinks from the discussion of? Perish for me such considerations! As a moral agent, as a member of a Christian community, I am not ashamed to maintain, and I trust I am not singular in my opinion, that no political right ought to be sustained, which is not founded on morality and justice.

The slave has a natural right to freedom. Could we replace him where slavery found him, he ought to be returned to that situation. But we cannot restore his cottage, his family, his relations, his country. If born a slave, we cannot often make him worthy of being a freeman. The only recompense we can make, is to treat him with consideration, and receive in return such service from him, as leaves him the reasonable enjoyment of himself. But because we have already deprived his country of millions, which have been sacrificed to our avarice, are we, for any argument that avarice or politics can adduce, to go on to murder and to destroy? Is moral reasoning, is equal justice, of so little consequence among us, as on this ungenerous ground to be set wholly aside? My candid adversary will blush, when he views this truly horrid business in this light; and even if the traffic were as valuable as he estimates it, would would spurn from him wealth, that must be acquired and kept by such methods. To do as we wish to be done by, is the dictate of natural justice, as well as of Christianity. We cannot lay any claim to the attributes of humanity, if we deprive them of the power of doing good.

But, p. 11. This point of political right is given up: for he says, “if the abolition were general, nothing could be more salutary, because every nation would be left in its relative situation.” But if it be a right general measure, is a right measure in respect of us. We are not accountable for, we are not concerned in, the conduct of others: if there be any connection, it must be safely left to the management of administration. Some nation must begin, and there are very strong reasons, why we should set the example. Other planters cannot be interested in it, while they enjoy the monopoly of the British market, where the price is higher than in any other place, and the demand increases faster than they can increase their produce. And so much persuaded am I (I shall make appear) of their being able to keep up, or even increase the present produce of sugar, from the number of slaves now in the colonies, without any new importation, that did they prove unable to supply the market, I should be induced to charge it to their mismanagement, rather than to allow a compensation; and should propose proper to be opened in the West-Indies, for the introduction of as much foreign sugar, as would make good the deficiency. Thus sugar would be kept at a moderate price to the consumer; our shipping would continue to be employed, and our revenue need suffer no injury. We do this in a scarcity of grain, why not also in a scarcity of sugar? But this remedy will only be necessary, should the planter wear his slaves out (as the author, p. 72 supposes) by ill treatment and severity.

Farther, p. 33. he says, "If planters were allowed time to prepare for the event, by stock- ing their estates to the full extent of their demands, the slave trade might be abolished."

Now while the slave market is open, inconsiderate planters, from their eagerness to push on the culture of their estates farther than it will profitably go, will continue to have demands on it. I solemnly affirm, that as often as I have heard the question concerning the buying or breeding of slaves discussed among planters, the preference has always been given to buying. The reader will determine what encouragement to population may be expected where this opinion prevails. And the fact in my time was, that nothing raised a manager's resentment sooner than to be informed that a negress was with child. I include not every manager; many are worthy humane men; I give it only as the prevailing opinion in this case. But a positive abolition of the slave trade will bring the planter to a sense of his interest. Useless domesticks will be turned into the field. One third of the number of hired servants will fully supply their place. The small number of these last will allow them to be well fed on a part of the present expense of domestick slaves, and their wages will be a small proportion of the sum which goes annually to purchase new slaves.

But, p. 16. It is allowed, that "where the planter is unencumbered, or has sufficient strength, there the stock may be kept up from the births." The number in this situation must be considerable. Every West-Indian family re-iding in Britain must be reckoned in it. only the overplus revenue, after providing the plantation, can be spent here. Therefore, a great part of the £60,000,000, claimed for ruin planters, will be saved in this class. Of involuntary planters, I affirm, that not one will be recovered from ruin by any purchase of new slaves at the present advanced price. When Long, near two years ago, wrote his History of Jamaica, vol. p. 437, such purchases only involved him farther in debt.* Slaves are now almost one third dearer, the expense of supporting them is increased. Without taking into account the frequent accidents of hurricanes and bad crops, new slaves not repay their first cost, interest, expense, and reduction of number in seasoning.

Again, p. 26. It is said, that “generally speaking, every West-Indian planter will affirm it to be very to be an evil; it is just to prevent negroes from being enslaved.” Then let us do what is just, and leave the issue to a watchful Providence. If slavery be an evil, if it be unjust to enslave negroes, he is in a dangerous situation, who by demand of them encourages this injustice, and promotes this evil. That politician, who, p. 27, is said to be “unable to square his conduct with moral rectitude,” will assuredly come short of his purpose. Suppose in this enlightened age, we were proposed to fit out a squadron to go up the Baltic, to land parties to murder those who refuse to seize on the helpless, to bribe the natives to kidnap each other, to be brought over tied ne

* Sixty years ago, Robertson, writing in favour of the planter, complains of the unprofitableness of African slaves though they cost then only from £22 to £25. See Part 3, Tracts, and heels to work in our coal mines; there is not a pretence for the present slave trade, for carrying on the manufacture of sugar, that may not be used here. It employs shipping, it saves our own people from a destructive employment; and if the Germans be warlike and oppose us, it will exercise us in arms. But if we spurn at this new scheme, because iniquitous and violent, why is the slave trade esteemed less violent and iniquitous, for having been the practice of two centuries? Do we use the woman’s argument for skinning eels alive, that the Africans are accustomed to it? Whatever may be the case of their country or race, individuals are not accustomed to it. To each unhappy wretch, it is a new, a fatal stroke, that carries him away for ever from his native spot, and determines and fixes his misery. Habit cannot contribute to make it tolerable. They sink under the anguish, and are lost for ever to society and themselves.

Nor can the good consequences of this horrid trade be pleaded in extenuation of its cruelties. From comparing the numbers imported into the colonies, with the number of Creoles left, it is plain not one African in ten leaves posterity behind him. But the value of a Creole slave, which is the only lasting good from importation, will be dearly purchased at the expense of ten new slaves. And if a new slave will neither repay his expense by his labour, nor leave a profitable posterity behind him, why is he purchased? Why adds the planter this unproductive bargain to his former incumbrances? Why is he concerned in a cruel traffic that cannot profit him; that must undo him?
I am sorry to observe, p. 13. the following sentiment in this candid writer: "Negroes are bought, not for population, but for work; which if not done, must ruin their owners." The conclusion is, that as the owner will not willingly ruin himself, the negroes must be worked at all hazards, and as "their condition exposes them to accidents conducing to depopulation, their numbers must decrease." The meaning is, sugar must be made, at the expense of the slave's life. Supposing this for a moment of those already slaves, is Britain to be charged with the expense of £60,000,000, because it forbids its own citizens any longer to commit robbery and murder, to supply slaves, who are professedly to be worked down unprofitably in the making of sugar? But why must the culture of the cane be conducted in a way, that admits not of an attention to the feelings of those employed in it? Are the claims of nature, and the cravings of civilization so irreconcilable as to destroy one another? It is acknowledged, p. 7. that "slaves, where not worked beyond their strength, are hearty, happy, and breed faster," P. 11. 24. that "the abolition of the slave trade, if general, would lessen the evils of slavery, and make the breeding and preservation of slaves more an object of attention." If these be the genuine effects of such a plan, what claim can he have on government, who, from a short-sighted love of gain, pushes his slaves beyond their strength, and destroys his property and prospects together? Let him meet with execration from every feeling heart, and fall unpitied!

But from various examples in the different islands, it is evident that excessive exertions have not not in one case in an hundred produced immediate profit; and that to keep the work of slaves within their strength is the best rate of employing them, the most profitable way of cultivating a plantation. The number of sick, dead, and runaways, the lillleness of those who remain, soon reduce the greatest exertions far below what might be got out of the gang with cheerfulness and ease. In every instance, and they have been numerous, within my observation, this pushing method defeated its own immediate purpose. Every plantation that required annual or frequent supplies went backward, and involved the owner. The quantity of work performed overlows not the slave; but the time he is kept drawing at it, which leaves him no indulgence, no leisure to rest his wearied limbs. He might do much more in half the time. Therefore, if planters, on the abolition of the slave trade, resolve, as is supposed, p. 15. "to persevere in making forced exertions," they will have themselves to thank for the consequent ruin. Parliament can dispose better of the publick money, than in making good their loss.

I shall now consider the immediate effects of the abolition of the slave trade on the planter’s property, the revenue, &c. We will suppose, with the Considerations, p. 4, that the plantation slaves are worth 20 millions, and the planters other property is equal to 40 millions, in all 60 millions. We will estimate the whole annual plantation produce of sugar, cotton, coffee, &c. to be equal to 230,000 hhd.s. of Muscovado sugar, worth in the colonies 17l. per hhd. *(their superiour

* A hhd. of sugar, and the rum made from it, may be estimated in the colonies at 21l. This supposes the rum worth various value in Britain seldom exceeding freight, insurance, and other expenses) or £1,250,000. Suppose the current annual expenses of plantation stores, managers, overseers, agents, surgeons salaries, taxes, feeding, clothing of slaves, to be 51. per head on half a million of slaves and white people employed on or about plantations, or £250,000. We trade with Africa for 40,000 slaves annually. The Considerations, p. 30. suppose one half sold to our planters. Twelve years ago prime slaves sold for £48. They are not become cheaper. But suppose them when sold by the lot £43, the annual supply of 20,000 will cost £860,000. Long, vol. 2, p. 482. says, they are not useful till after three years. Three years interest must then be added. The interest in the colonies varies from 10 to 6 per cent. Little money is lent to planters without a premium; or what is worse, consignments of sugar. Suppose the interest 7 per cent; three years interest is £180,600. At the three years end, the 20,000 slaves will have cost £1,040,000. This, added to annual expenses, leaves £710,000 for the returns of a capital of 60 millions; something better than one per cent. This is the profit of the manufacture which we are solicited to support.

The slaves in all our colonies, taking those in Jamaica from a late estimate, and supposing the other islands to have lately decreased 40,000, may worth 41. The sugar imported into Britain anno 1787, was 160,000 hhds. worth by this estimate without the rum 2,720,000l, with the rum, 3,360,000l. This is a very high estimate, for the custom returns make the whole exportation of this year from the sugar islands, including coffee, cocoa, cotton, indigo, &c. only 3,613,147l.

be reckoned 450,000. Of these the Creoles must make 350,000; and among them the proportion between the sexes follows the course of nature. The African slaves, of which the greater part is male, cannot exceed 100,000. For these all die in fifteen years, and one third in the first three years*. But, about twelve years ago, the war put almost an entire stop to their importation; so that four-fifths of all purchased before that time must be dead; and since the return of peace, the trade has been chiefly turned to the supply of St. Domingo. It is remarkable, that in this island, in the six years preceding 1774, there had been introduced 103,000 African slaves, and 61,728 had been born, making together 164,728; of which in 1774, there remained in all 40,000. To return, suppose these 450,000 slaves rented. Their rent and insurance would, at the low rate of £10 per head be £4,500,000, which exceeds their whole produce, and leaves nothing for the returns of lands, &c. worth 40 millions more. Such is the property which parliament is called on to make good. We will take it in the most favourable point of view. If the planter pays his annual current expenses, and supports his stock, all except negroes, out of a sum equal to the rum, coffee, &c. and such a part of the sugar as leaves for the return of his capital £12 per hhd. on the sugar alone, he is tolerably well satisfied. An ordinary crop of sugar (as that of 1787 was), is about 160,000 hlds. at £12, or £1,920,000. Strike off £920,000 for the supply of slaves, we have one million for the returns of a capital of

* Robertson in his Detection, p. 44, says; the loss in slaves is one in fifteen, sometimes one in seven.
60 millions, or about 1½ per cent. If any plantation requires no supplies, then the returns are about 3 per cent. But not one half of the plantations support themselves, or make any returns on their capitals; this will allow of a certain proportion to make 4, 5, or some few 8 per cent. on their capital; but only if they buy no new slaves.

Long tells us, vol. 2. p. 437, 438, that the proportion of two hhd's. of sugar to three slaves, all ages included, is the utmost quantity they should be made to produce, if the planter wishes to keep up or increase them from their births. It is indeed a greater proportion than the colonies at present supply; and therefore the slaves ought to increase from their births*. Suppose these three slaves valued only at £50 each; (though, twelve years ago, I have known gangs, including all ages, valued at £60) or £150. The lands or property occupied by them are worth double, or £300. The two hhd's. of sugar produced by the three slaves, after providing above for every expense, except new slaves, are worth £24. But the interest of the three slaves, and other property occupied by them at 6 per cent. is £27. The insurance of the slaves at 5 per cent. is £7 10s. in all, £32 10s. the loss is £8 10s. Suppose the slaves rented: rent and insurance is now seldom so low as £12 per head; take it only at £10, or on three slaves £30. Here is a loss on them of £6, and no return on

* Even were we to allow the whole returns of the sugar colonies to be equal to 250,000 hhd's. of sugar, to which they seldom amount, at the proportion of three slaves to two hhd's. they would require only 375,000 slaves. The truth is, the slaves in our colonies hardly return half a hhd. value £1. 10s. per head, to pay the current expenses, and give an interest on their own value, and the lands and stock which they occupy.
the lands, &c. worth £300, which, at 6 per cent. are worth £18. In these calculations, no allowance is made for hurricanes or bad crops, or high interest; and in several colonies the proportion of sugar is set too high. Barbadoes contains 64,000 slaves. After allowing for the current expenses, its produce is not £4 for each slave, without supposing any returns for lands, &c. worth 6 millions. Montserrat contains 9000 slaves, and makes 3000 hhd.s, of sugar, or one hhd. for three slaves. Here also can be no returns for lands, &c. worth one million. Dominica returns not one per cent. of the money laid out on it.

We have observed, that 20,000 new slaves cost in three years £1,040,000. But, in three years time, according to Long, vol. 2. p. 434. a third part (sometimes one half) is dead. We have then 13,700 slaves, worth £1,040,000. To this we must add three years expense of physic, feeding, cloathing, &c. This we will make only £10 on the original number of 20,000, or £200,000. We have then 13,700 slaves, which cost the planter £1,240,000, or £90 each slave; The reader will observe, that in the first estimate, the expense of feeding the slaves, &c. at £5 per head, is thrown among the current expenses. But here, where we estimate the value of the slaves, it is an addition to their value, till they become useful. These calculations are founded on the Planter’s own concessions, or on estimates which he must admit. They may be varied, but the conclusion will come out nearly the same. Particularly no just estimate can be framed of the expense of new slaves, that makes not the survivors exceed £90 in value. Long, vol. 2. p. 435. supposes that often one half dies. Robertson, p. 11, says two-two-fifths are lost in seasoning. This would raise each of the survivors to £124. In many cases, in our islands, it has been two-thirds. In one within my own knowledge, had the remnant of slaves been fold each for £400, the owner would have been a loser. In the most favourable case that can be put, the survivors of African slaves never pay for the cost and expense of the whole lot. We have observed the unproductive labour of slaves, valued only at £50. When valued at £90 or more, the loss will be more considerable. Three slaves at £90 are worth £270. Their rent and insurance at this high value cannot be so low as £12 each, or in all, £36. But the two hinds of sugar produced by them are worth only £24, after paying current expenses. There are £12 lost on the rent, and £18 lost on the lands, &c. occupied by them. If these calculations be disputed, it is hoped the Planter will correct them, by stating them in his own way. I have gone by the best information I could procure, and have stated them from the Planters own advocates.

We may therefore conclude, that no new importation of new slaves can turn out profitably to the planter; but as Long acknowledges, vol. 2. p. 347. and Robertson laments, must form only a new addition to his debts and difficulties. Therefore, the abolition of the slave trade, far from giving the planter a claim to compensation, will really save him. Government will prevent him from continuing to involve himself unnecessarily in bankruptcy and ruin. The only means by which he can improve his condition is, as Long advises, to use prudent regulations in the right husbanding of his stock, and promoting its increase by natural means.

But
But indeed the annual supply of new slaves, which in any case, with all its consequences, can hardly be set below a million in value, is such a drain as no profit can admit of; nor can any possible reduction in the produce supposed to follow the abolition of the slave trade, affect the planter's profit equally with this annual drain; so that it must be a profitable measure, which at any hazard cuts it off. The sum paid for new slaves, if saved, would allow of encouragement to white people for domestics and artisans, that where there is a want of slaves to keep up the full cultivation of the estate, domestic slaves may be turned into the field to make up the deficiency.

It appears that the Creole slaves, where the sexes are proportioned to each other, according to Long's estimate of three slaves to two hogsheads, without taking the Africans into account, may increase the present produce, even in the liberal estimate of 250,000 hhds. at which we have set it (for the rum is included here in the making of sugar to make up that quantity of produce, and requires hardly any extra number of slaves) and may not only keep up, but increase their numbers. Therefore, if the planter be not his own enemy, he needs not come to government for relief, or go to the slave-market for recruits; his crops, his property, will not be affected. He will need no compenation. The publick treasury needs not be opened to reimburse the 60 millions West-Indian property, with the annihilation of which we are threatened.

But it is said, the revenue will annually lose two millions; because no sugar will be imported. Suppose not an ounce of sugar imported, our ability to pay taxes would not on that account be lessened. Allow the revenue, freight, &c. on sugar to be two millions, and the sugar itself to be worth four millions. The British consumers then pay six millions for sugar. If no sugar were used, he could then pay government six millions instead of two. If anything be used for sugar, a revenue may be raised on that article. If we have foreign sugar, government may increase the tax, because it will come one-third cheaper than from our own colonies. The planter is not to suppose he contributes one farthing of these two millions, any more than the Emperor of China does of the commutation tea-tax, except for the consumption of sugar in his own family, residing in Britain. The consumer pays the tax. Sugar is only the medium by which it is raised on the publick. The like ruin to the revenue was predicted, when America threatened to withhold her tobacco; but we have experienced no such effect from the measure.

Again, the abolition of the slave-trade will ruin the West-Indian trade, which will ruin our marine, p. 22. I trust the West-Indian trade is in no danger. But suppose the one annihilates the other. We shall, by abandoning the slave trade, save more seamen than the other employs. The African slave trade destroys annually 2000 men; in ten years 20,000.* The sugar colonies may employ 12,000 seamen. The loss here is 3 in 200. Suppose annually 200, in ten years 2000. The whole number of men employed in the West-India trade in ten years, is 14,000. But in this time 20,000 are lost in the slave trade. If both were annihilated, in ten years we should have 6000 men.

I trust I have removed effectually the fear of a demand to be made on the treasury for 60 millions West-India property to be annihilated by the abolition of the slave trade. I have on the contrary proved, that the planter will not be injured, but relieved; or if injured, that he must blame his own severity and avarice. I have proved, and shall farther prove, that commerce will not be hurt, that the revenue or shipping need not be lessened. In short, that the measure is agreeable to the demands of humanity and justice, and also to the suggestions of prudence and political wisdom. One may blush to think these should ever be placed in opposition. The author of nature never intended to separate them. They will never be found in opposition, when every consequence is taken into account. Whatever is just or honourable leads to profit and advantage, as well publick as private. Must a great nation be obliged to send out robbers to destroy and enslave an innocent people in a different quarter of the globe; or let these on to destroy and enslave each other for the increase of its revenue? Can any advantages, so procured, turn out well at the last? This traffick steels the heart against every human feeling; it corrupts the mind, and, if continued, will prove a canker to eat into our prosperity and importance.

In combating the West-India planter’s reasoning, I preserve the utmost respect for his candour. I trust I shall have pleased him in shewing that that justice and humanity, which he generously acknowledges to be on the side of the abolition contended for, are not at variance with political rights rights or worldly prudence. He himself favours the plan, if the planter's interest could be secured. The whole depends on the circumstance of new slaves being a profitable or losing purchase. Robertson says, planters deem it a misfortune, that England, after the restoration, refused to continue to supply them with white servants. See his Inquiry, p. 54. Long agrees with me in their having been found a losing bargain near twenty years ago. Since that they have advanced near one-third in value, and every expense about them is increased, What is the fair conclusion which he makes? that the purchase must hasten the ruin of every involved planter.

In stating the following objections, I have collected from every quarter, whatever I have found urged on the subject, and have given the most direct answers, each in its respective place. To preserve brevity, I have been as careful as possible to give no more on each head, than is necessary to obviate the objection in its most direct sense.

I shall here remark, that till it can be fairly proved by the planter, in opposition to the reasoning here used, and the authority of Robertson and Long, that African slaves are, generally speaking, a profitable purchase, no argument for the continuance of the slave trade, as far as it may affect our colonies, can have any weight on political considerations. And though this should be indubitably proved, and no answer here given should be sustained as valid, yet ought the slave trade to be abolished, as long as its advocates allow, "that it is unjust to enslave negroes," that people, in respect of us, innocent, are dragged from their homes and families, are murdered in a thou-and ways, by chains, confinement, suffocating air, cruel treatment; that they are forcibly transported to distant islands, where not one in ten takes root, and there made to drawl out a wretched existence in incessant labour, without food, without clothes, without rest, under the capricious treatment of any sort of master, or any unfeeling boy that may be set with a whip over them.

If we allow that power may confer right, may stifle a brother's groans, and trample on every unalienable privilege of human nature, let us boldly declare it, and send our fleets and armies, wherever resistance is not expected, wherever slaves may be seized, and plunder or revenue may be acquired. It is now only that this object has caught the publick attention. Hitherto we have suffered ourselves to be persuaded, by interested men, without inquiry, of the advantage and propriety of this inhuman traffick. But after this open discussion, we cannot possibly go back. We will not, surely, permit certain murder to be carried on; and we cannot pretend to regulate a traffick, which is founded on murder, and cannot be separated from it. Should we permit this traffick to be continued, we declare ourselves to be the general enemies of mankind; we are to be considered as a nation of robbers, and deserve to be suspected and held in abhorrence, and guarded against by every surrounding and distant state.

J. R.
Objections to the Abolition of the Slave Trade, with Answers.

Objection 1. The planter will show his resentment of the measure, by treating his slaves more cruelly than before.

Answer 1. The sudden diminution of his property, in consequence of such treatment, will discover to him the prudence of accommodating himself to his new situation, and the necessity of treating his slaves with humanity.

Objection 2. The sugar colonies will throw themselves into the arms of France.

Answer 2. Then will Britain be freed of the expense of their protection, and be able to procure plenty of sugar at two thirds of the present price. Planters complain that they can hardly cultivate their plantations, while enjoying the monopoly of the the British market. How will they bear the reduction of one third of its value in the markets of their new masters, for that is the ordinary proportion of the price of French sugars? This is an impotent threat, which for obvious reasons should have passed unnoticed, had it not been industriously circulated both in conversation and writing with a view to intimidate. I trust Britain has learned wisdom sufficient not to fight to retain them.

Object. 3. Planters in debt will carry their slaves to the Spanish colonies.

Answ. 3. This may be left to the vigilance of their creditors.

Object. 4. The abolition of the slave trade is a plan of the new States of America to get possession of the sugar colonies.

Answ. 4. The reader may be assured, that this objection, however extraordinary, has been actually started; and it is indeed so truly unanswerable, that it must be left to operate on his fears with all its force.

Object. 5. Sugar cannot be procured from foreigners.

Answ. 5. While sugar is made, British money will command it. Foreign sugars, near one third cheaper than British, have long found their way into our colonies. The importation may be extended, but it will not be necessary. Indeed sugar might be brought from the East-Indies, made by by free men, much cheaper than slaves can possibly produce it in the West-Indies. Good clayed sugar is sold in Batavia by the cwt. for about 13s. Arrack made from it is worth only 8d. per gallon. These prices would allow of the expense of freight to Europe, and the sugar to be sold at 3d. per pound in England. In Cochin China it is made even at half this price.

Object. 6. The planter will prove the absurdity of the measure, by increasing the severity of his manner of treating his slaves.

Answ. 6. When he finds his property hurt by such a step, he will desist from his unfeeling conduct. Even suppose the whole destroyed by such a method, the abolition of the slave trade would soon compensate it to our common nature on the continent of Africa.

Object. 7. Involved planters will waste their slaves by excessive exertions.

Answ. 7. Excessive exertions have constantly proved ruinous. Nor can the necessity of making such exertions be avoided by the introduction of new slaves; because they cannot possibly be made (see introduction) to pay their first cost, expense, and loss in seasoning. Still the involved planter shuts his eyes, and goes on, though every example around him solicits him to abandon the vain attempt. The craving of avarice, and the pressure of debt, increase every year, till ruin and bankruptcy close the scene of tyranny and wretchedness.

Object. 8.
intentions of the donor, and the wishes of humanity.

Object. II. Dr. Burton, Secretary to this society, wrote a letter to Mr. Benezet, under the direction of an eminent prelate, which acknowledged the lawfulness of slavery, as mentioned in the Bible.

Answ. II. That letter appears plainly to have been written under the impression of an alarm for the consequences of agitating then the question of liberty, for which the slaves were not prepared, nor the times fit. But even in these circumstances, the society demanded for the slaves all that we contend for in the present advanced state of the question; "That slaves should be treated with the utmost care and kindness, both with regard to temporals and spirituals; that their labour should be made easy to them in all respects; that they should be provided with conveniences and accommodations to render their situation comfortable; and especially that they should be regularly instructed in the principles of the Christian religion."

The abstract question, "is slavery lawful?" is not now agitated. We may allow its lawfulness in any case, where it can be proved, that injustice, murder, oppression, and avarice, has not been exercised. The present question is, "may Liverpool merchants fit out ships with arms, chains, baubles, and brandy, to bribe the Africans to rise against their countrymen, to murder some, to enslave others; to be delivered up to them to be chained, suffocated, starved; to be transported to the sugar colonies to work for planters without food, rest, or raiment; to be ill treated without cessation," cessation, without remedy. The Doctor, writing on the first question, leaves it as he found the practice to be in the times of the apostles. The Liverpool slave trade was not before him; and even could the highest human sanction be produced in its favour, nature would revolt and refuse her assent to the decision. We are not indeed concerned in the defence of Dr. Burton. The subject had not then been canvassed, and was not understood. Dr. Burton's affirming slavery to be lawful, when he offers only vague or inconclusive reasoning in favour of his opinion, ought not to preclude us at this time from discussing the subject, or forming a more just estimate of its merits.

Object. 12. The treatment of horses should be regulated at home, before we look to Africa.

Answ. 12. When we have vindicated the rights of our fellows, it is to be hoped horses will be considered; for doubtless they are an object of police. But doth not this shew, that a slave is esteemed a mere beast of burden.

Object. 13. To imprison debtors, and impress men to serve in war, are violations of moral law, equally with domestic slavery. Considerations, p. 28.

Answ. 13. He who runs in debt knows the consequences; but all is a force upon the poor negroe. Many men enter into the sea and land service willingly; and those who are impressed are treated as volunteers are. But we never heard of an African offering himself to be received into a slave ship; nor when he was forced on board, of having been put on a footing with the ship's crew. But the impressed sailor is among his countrymen, men, and serves his country. What common tie subsists between an African, living 1200 miles from the sea-coast, and a West-Indian planter, to induce him to submit to be tied neck and heel, to die a thousand suffocating deaths on ship board; to go and be beaten, half starved, and abused, in the cultivation of a plant, from which he reaps no profit?

Object. 14. The agitation of this question will raise a rebellion among the slaves.

Answ. 14. Helpless wretches! Their spirits are too much broken down to think of rebellion. But if it be suspected, let the planters, instead of moving heaven and earth to prevent their relief, come nobly forward, and propose a plan for their protection. They will bless and cheerfully serve them.

It seems the Assembly of Jamaica have discreetly taken this precaution; and in the preamble to the bill have fully established against the advocates for slavery, all the oppression and misery with which this helpless state has been charged in our colonies.

Object. 15. Slaves cannot be trusted with arms.

Answ. 15. They have formed a part of the militia in Barbadoes, and have been found faithful. This would universally be the case, were they advanced in society. They acquire the emulation of Britons, and would exert themselves in their cause, had they privileges or property to contend for.

Object. 16. Africa is unable to support her inhabitants, without allowing of emigration.

C 2  Answ.
Answ. 16. Let then our slave traders wait, till they are invited to carry away the overplus inhabitants. But does this agree with the account of the wild or desolated state in which every part of Africa appears, whence the wretched inhabitants have been carried away. If Africa overflowed, it would not be necessary to tie the emigrants two and two with yokes, to prevent their escape. They would issue in the shape of armies, and must be opposed not with cart whips, but with arms.

Object. 17. Negroes are an inferior race of beings.

Answ. 17. This is boldly affirmed by Mr. Estwick; but every man of candour acquainted with them will deny it. But suppose it, will those who plead for laws in favour of horses, maintain that negroes are to be trepanned, murdered by thousands, and enslaved for the indulgence of our avarice?

Object. 18. Slaves of negroe grandees are as much their stock as a farmer’s implements are his.

Answ. 18. What is this to a Liverpool trader? Has he a charter for making a profit of all the villany and injustice that prevails in the world? Suppose the wretched slaves originally the property of tyrants. Is he at liberty to add to their suffering, and make their lot still more miserable? If their tyrants were not bribed to part with them, they would have strong inducements to keep and make them profitable for themselves. But when we offer spirits, and every other alluring bribe in exchange for them, every trifling temporary temporary disgust in the master, seals the fate of the slave to new hardships, to undescrivable sufferings.

Object. 19. Leo Africanus describes the negroes of his time, anno 1500, as brutish, and then sold for slaves, before the commencement of the present traffic.

Answ. 19. He says the shepherds and mountaineers, of all the different African nations, as well as negroes, were brutish; but that the people of the plains and cities were polished, having arts, sciences, and laws among them. He visited only the settlements along the Senegal branch of the Niger, and says the countries southward were possessed by rich industrious people, great lovers of justice and equity. He mentions the kings of Tombuto and Burno, two negro states, as going to war to take slaves to be sold to merchants, trading to Egypt and the Mediterranean cities. But do we argue for slavery, because at all times the strong have enthralled the weak? Because Joseph was sold by his brethren, was Pharoah vindicated for enslaving the whole Hebrew nation? Or are we to continue for ever to encourage negroes to kidnap each other to be sold to us, because 300 years ago the king of Tombuto kidnapped and sold his neighbours?

Object. 20. No negroe nation makes a figure in agriculture, or useful arts.

Answ. 20. We are apt, like the old Greeks, to term every thing barbarous, that differs from our own artificial manners. But let any man read Mr. Mathews's Account of Guinea, professedly published to vindicate the slave trade, and say whether whether they have not laws and customs worthy of the imitation of the most enlightened nations, and possess not a knowledge of agriculture and arts, that wants only an extension of observation to be beforehand with several nations in Europe.

Object. 21. Supplies from Africa are necessary to keep up the stock.

Answ. 21. Because planters prefer the hopes (I deny they ever possess the substance, see Introd.) of present profit to future advantage; and commit their affairs to managers, who, being not concerned in what may happen thirty years hence, prefer the buying to the breeding of slaves. Hence we may judge how far to believe them, when they say they favour population. Or how can population be favoured where there is a want of food, clothes, and every conveniency necessary for its encouragement? where, perhaps, the plantation is left to a raw lad, who knows nothing of government but the whip, who has no care but to hurry on the work; who, pinched himself in every necessary, has nothing to divide with the nurse, or the sick, the faint or hungry slave. But stop the trade, and their opinion and practice will both be changed. That increase of slaves from the births, which accompanies humane treatment on every plantation, in every island where now practised, will then be general. But wherefore should we go to Africa for slaves? Why not to France, Spain, or Italy? It would be equally lawful, and the little opposition we might meet with, would encourage a military spirit among us, without the expense of fleets or armies.
Object. 22. Small plantations in debt, will be abandoned, or united to others.

Answ. 22. It is the best thing that can happen both to debtor and creditor; for such never pay interest money; nor indeed do they support themselves, except where the planter is out of debt, and lives with his slaves, planting provisions for himself and them, and being contented to send to market as much sugar as an attention to these objects will permit, to purchase what his plantation affords not.

Object. 23. Large plantations will send less sugar to market.

Answ. 23. In every plantation much land is put in canes that pays not for the culture. Perhaps one fourth part of St. Kitts is in this situation, and a much greater proportion in some other colonies. Turn this into provisions for the slaves, and grails for the cattle; fewer slaves will do the work, and the reduced quantity of land reserved for the canes, getting more manure, will stand the weather better, and produce more certain and better crops.

Object. 24. The importation of sugar, and its revenue, will be affected.

Answ. 24. The importation of sugar will never be profitably increased (see introduction) by the purchase of African slaves; and we have proved that the revenue depends not on the quantity of sugar made in our own colonies; for we may raise the same, or higher duties, on foreign sugars. (See Introduction, and Object. 5.)

Object. 25. The consumption of British commodities in the islands will be lessened.

Answ. 25. The consumption of the sugar colonies is hardly half the consumption of half a million of people in a distant quarter of the globe. But the abolition will greatly increase it. For the slaves must be better supplied than hitherto with necessaries; and as they advance in society they will increase in their demands.

Object. 26. The cultivation of the cane will be diminished.

Answ. 26. So it may, and yet the quantity of sugar, and the profit from it, be increased, if only what pays for the culture (Object. 23.) be used; lands producing less than an hogshead per acre, hardly pay for the culture. Our islands contain about four millions of acres. A crop is taken from the same land every second year; from some fresh lands every year; 120,000 acres of good land selected for each crop, might give from 180,000 to 200,000 hogsheads, which exceeds a medium crop at present. According to Long's estimate, 200,000 hogsheads may be made by 300,000 slaves, without lessening their numbers. A much less number properly fed and worked, and assisted with cattle, would be sufficient.

Object. 27. The new islands require new slaves, and plantations underbanded may be improved by them.

Answ. 27.
Answ. 27. Hardly has one plantation in the new islands given the lowest usual interest on its cost and expenses. But the price of African slaves is now advanced so high (Object. 24) that henceforth no purchase of them can possibly turn out profitable. The value of a negroe's labour, according from Long's estimate, vol. 2. p. 437, 438, of three slaves to two hhd's, can be reckoned only at £8. But the usual rent and insurance of a slave, is from £10 to £12, and there is nothing left for the returns of the lands, &c. occupied by them. If ever, from this time, new lands be brought into culture, some other method, than this of working them by African slaves, must be tried. Let the planter twst the calculation as he pleases, he will never prove a new slave profitable.*

Object. 28. The planter can bear no interruption in the annual supply of slaves.

Answ. 28. In the late war he bore the interruption for about six years, without any sensible injury. Since that time he has made but small use of the trade; but though in his own power, has turned it over to the French and Spaniards. There is an accommodating disposition in man, that adapts itself to necessity. This measure indeed will only keep the planter, even in the opinion of Long, from running in debt.

* Robertson indeed supposes a slave to produce a hhd. of sugar; but whatever it might be ann. 1730, when he wrote, it is double of what is now produced. Even supposing particular instances of plantations where this proportion takes place, the profit will be found exceeding small, when every expense is deducted.

Object. 29.
Object. 29. The planter will be ruined.

Answ. 29. Not one will be injured (Object. 7, 27, 28.) whose ruin is not already sealed. He who is not in debt, will accommodate himself to his situation. He will throw out, or fellow his poor grounds. He will manure better what remains. He will allot lands for provisions and grass. He will use the assistance of cattle. He will work slaves not as hitherto against time, but a certain task of work. He will allow them food, rest, and clothing. He will hire white people, or free negroes and mulattoes (of whom there are great numbers in the colonies, without employment) for domesticks, and turn his slaves into the field. He will buy up around him for the culture of the cane, those slaves that are now employed in less productive labour, or that belong to poor free people, who are kept poor and idle, depending on their slaves industry. This plan is also the best that the involved planter can pursue, unless he can sell his slaves and other property to a more wealthy neighbour. Thus by being prevented from purchasing new slaves, many may be forced to methods of humanity, and saved from otherwise inevitable ruin.

Object. 30. A sugar plantation is a profitable manufactory.

Answ. 30. It is, even in the opinion of Robertson and Long, an expensive losing one. It will in no case succeed, but on a large scale, where it can have within itself provisions, recruits of slaves and cattle. Even few of the most profitable could bear to be brought to calculation, if their their expenses were carried on from the first purchase.

Object. 31. White men cannot work in a West-Indian climate.

Answ. 31. Nor white nor black can support unremitting labour, without food or rest. But white men kept from new rum, may, in the morning and evening, perform double the present task of slaves, without suffering from the climate. Barbadoes, St. Kitts, and Nevis, were originally settled by white men. It was only on the introduction of negroes, that they began to decrease in numbers.* But the mortality could not possibly have been greater among them than has been lately in the new islands, and in clearing fresh lands in Jamaica.

Object. 32. Nor will they work with slaves.

Answ. 32. Poor white men work along with their slaves. The best fortunes that have been established in the West Indies, have been made by those, who first worked to buy, and then shared labour with a slave. There is, I believe, a baronet now alive, whom his mother tied on her back,

Robertson, p. 45, observes, that even after the restoration, the whites exceeded the blacks in number; that the slave trade was not extended till after that time. He says, Inquiry, p. 10, for the first 30 years, Barbadoes was cultivated by white servants, and might advantageously have been continued, p. 52. He says, planters would not use slaves (Africans) if they could avoid it, p. 54. They deem it a misfortune that England refused to continue to supply them with white servants, p. 15, that the slave trade destroys millions of lives.
while she fed the mill with canes. The author became acquainted with a Frenchman in St. Vincent's, who began with his two hands, and settled and stocked in succession, five coffee plantations.

Object. 33. Free negroes or mulattoes will not work with slaves in the field.

Answ. 33. Then hire them as domestics, and turn domestic slaves into the field. The colonies at present contain twice as many slaves as are necessary, if properly assisted, treated, and worked, to send the present produce to the market; and any supply of labourers, if really wanted, is preferable to the African slave trade. Nor can an objection to the turning of domestics and others into the field, be made by him, who proposes to go to Africa to kidnap, or encourage others to kidnap, and force happy free people from their native country, to endure a succession of miseries in their passage to the West-Indies, that perhaps one in ten may work in his field a half starved slave.

Object. 34. Slaves are captives saved from the sword, under a tacit agreement of serving the conqueror, or him to whom he may allot their services, under pain, if at any time disobedient, of being put to the sword.

Answ. 34. A man contending with a man in a state of nature, may put his adversary to death, to place his own life out of danger. But when his safety is effected, he loses all power over his adversary's life. Nor can he recover that power by any circumstance, or any fiction, till he and his adversary, (in this case his slave) be placed in the the situation, in which the relation of master and slave commenced. Suppose this tacit compact; on the part of the slave, it was made under the impression of bodily fear, and cannot therefore be equally binding with a free compact. The circumstance that brought him within his adversary's power, might, in his opinion, be treachery, or violence. He will therefore submit to the consequences only till he can help himself. But suppose this compact binding in any moral degree, a breach of it in the slave must be judged by the laws of the community, of which he is become a member. By being admitted into the family or service of his conqueror, he is, or should be, considered as belonging to the community. The master loses his absolute power over him, the moment he sheaths his sword; and the conduct of each to the other must be judged by the laws which obtain in the state. This appears even in the bloody law of Barbadoes; for in fixing a scandalous fine on the master who murders his slave, it declares that the power of life and death is not in him, but the publick.

This interpretation is agreeable to the mild doctrine of the scriptures, which the advocates for slavery are constantly wretsting to the most horrid purposes. When Elisha led the Assyrians blindfold to Samaria, the king of Israel says, "Shall I smite them." The prophet forbids him (not in the name of the Lord), but refers him to an acknowledged principle of equity, "Wouldest thou smite those whom thou hast taken captive with thy sword, and with thy bow." (2 Kings vi. 22.) This plainly admits that the victor loses all power of life and death, by taking his adversary prisoner. Therefore the African tyrant conveys no such power, power, by transferring his captives over to Liverpool traders; nor can they be purchased from him, under the persuasion of his having any such right.

Object. 35. Slaves are necessary as domestics, and handy-craftsmen.

Answ. 35. A slave handy-craftsman, performs not one third of the ordinary task of a freeman. But white handy-craftsmen may be increased as wanted. Families entertain from 20 to 60 slaves, who do not the work of 5 or 6 hired servants. The whole number of tradesmen, domestics and others, not employed about sugar in the colonies, may be estimated at 150,000. These being effective people, and worked in the field, well fed, properly tasked, and assisted by cattle, might of themselves send more than the present quantity of sugar to market. This exchange from the house to the field, often takes place from caprice, as a punishment; and handy-craft slaves are occasionally sent in there. In any case, the exchange cannot encroach so much on the rights of humanity, as the slave trade to Africa.

Object. 36. No supply can be found if the trade be abolished.

Answ. 36. This is answered (Object, 27, 28, 29.) Perhaps not more than one half of the effective slaves in our colonies is actually employed in the culture of the cane. There is then in the colonies a sufficient supply of field slaves, till the encouragement of population shall have taken effect.

Object.
Object. 37. Africa will gain nothing by our abandoning the trade.

Answ. 37. Suppose this true; may we not use the same argument for going to rob and murder travellers on the high-way; because, were we to stay at home, they might probably be robbed and murdered by others? Are we to pay no regard to equity and justice, because these rules may possibly be infringed by others equally in a particular case, whether we meddle or meddle not? Is it not an insult to the national character, to attempt to impose such reasoning on the publick? Is it not declaring to all Europe, that profit is the idol to which we bow?

But while the advocates of slavery are forced to acknowledge, that this trade renders the state of Africans in their own country insecure and wretched, they must allow that a change is a thing to be desired. But some one must first begin; and who more proper than that state, which has carried on the horrid traffic with peculiar circumstances of systematic cruelty, farther than any other nation. Suppose Africa not relieved; yet by our abolition of the slave trade, we shall retrieve our reputation, we shall save the lives of our seamen, we shall prevent the mixing of innocent blood with our riches, with our revenues, to be a canker to eat into our private happiness and publick prosperity. But assuredly the benefit will be extended to Africa, will improve her manners, will civilize her tribes, and gradually exalt her state among the nations.

Object. 38. Slaves are happier than English peasants.

Answ.
Answ. 38. Have peasants their eyes beat out, their bones broken, their flesh furrowed by the whip, their wives exposed to a bailiff's lust? Are they, without remedy, confined to any, the most unreasonable oppressive master? Are their wives and children taken from them, and sold to distant parts? Are they obliged to cultivate barren spots of ground on Sundays for food? Is their daily allowance six ounces of flour? Have they no warm clothing; no linen to wrap their new-born babe in? But it is endless to mark the difference. The assertion insults common sense.

Object. 39. Negroes are happier in the colonies than in Africa.

Answ. 39. Positively denied. Do they ever offer themselves to be received into our slave ships, to escape from their wretched country? Is there not a charm in the place of nativity, that makes, to the natives, Greenland more desirable than the polished parts of Europe? Do they not seize every opportunity of rising against, or escaping from their oppressors? Do they not increase in their own country, and decrease in our more desirable colonies? For one moment suppose this true. For one that lives to settle in the West-Indies, ten are killed, suffocated, or lost to Africa. To make one man happy, must ten be destroyed? But how can wretched Africa bear an annual loss of 200,000 people in the prime of life, at which the slave trade and its consequences may be fairly estimated, while happy West-Indians (by the report of the African merchant, a writer on the planter's side) require an annual supply of 40,000, or nearly one tenth of the whole?

This
This objection is advanced for a particular purpose, and is exaggerated. But we know certainly that little and very easy labour supplies them with food and clothing in Africa; unceasing labour starves them in the West-Indies. Indeed, how can they be said to be happy in a country, who, in several islands, have not a scrap of land allotted for their maintenance, that can be turned to any other culture?

Object. 40. Creole negroes degenerate, therefore the breed must be kept up by African slaves.

Answ. 40. Suppose the fact true, I venture to affirm, that few inhabitants of the sugar colonies have ever placed themselves in circumstances to make the observation. It is rather surprising that it was never brought forward till the month of May, 1788. But I in the strongest manner deny the fact from my own observation. In every case within my knowledge, the farther back the negro could trace his Creolism, the more he valued himself, the more he was valued. Families degenerate, which, like Egyptian kings, confine their marriages to brothers and sisters. But there is no reason why a progeny drawn from the casual intercourse of individuals of a hundred nations, differing in feature, language, and customs, should degenerate, except from hard and oppressive usage, which stifles nature in its origin; and this can derive small honour on the planter, who adduces this argument in favour of his harsh treatment of his slaves.

Object. 41. The labour of slaves is cheaper than that of free men.

Answ. 41.
Answ. 41. Most positively denied*. The planter affirms, that it requires six slaves to do the work of one peasant.† The most pinching allowance that can be given to a slave, and the lowest estimate his rent and insurance can be laid at, must amount to a much larger sum, than the price of the bare handy labour of any peasant, without cattle and instruments of husbandry. But it has been proved (see introduction) that the labour of a slave pays not for his cost and expense in seasoning. A master must supply the death of a slave at an enormous expense from the slave-market. For a little better food and clothing, in return for a double task of work, the peasant, without cost, breeds labourers in succession for his employers. But when it is acknowledged that slaves do less work than peasants, (if they do it cheaper, then they earn less in the same time, and have therefore less means to buy the comforts of life) how then can they be happier than English peasants, for example, (Object. 38.) who earn so much more by their labour, and therefore have more the means of indulgence?

Object. 42. Suppose a plague among slaves, how is the loss to be repaired?

Answ. 42. Suppose a plague in London, must the citizens form themselves into bands, to go

* Wherever this assertion is used, the objection has either been already obviated, or the reason follows on which this answer is founded. The Reader, I trust, will find no simple assertion of this kind; except where the Author’s experience entitles him to oppose to unfounded affirmation, what he himself has been an eye-witness of; and where attempts have been made to impose on men, who have never been in circumstances to examine the facts alleged.
and surround and set fire to the neighbouring towns, and murder, rob, and carry off the inhabitants, to make good the loss? Or, will they, for this purpose, fit out ships, and commit depredations on the coast of France? Would they not rather endeavour to purify their town, encourage matrimony, and grant privileges to such useful people, as could be persuaded to settle among them, and wait patiently for the result?

Object. 43. Emancipation of slaves will ruin the master.

Answ. 43. It is not even suggested, (See introduction) till their improvement shall have made it the master's interest freely to bestow it. The simple abolition of the trade, operating as a kind necessity on the interest and discretion of the planter, and taking away this delusive lure from short-sighted avarice, will do every thing at present for the slave, that humanity requires. If any abuses remain, they may be regulated as discovered, without injury to the master's property, or his just authority over it.

Object. 44. If freed they will not work.

Answ. 44. This conclusion is drawn from the indolence of savages. But it is not proposed to free them, till they shall have been civilized, and prepared for the government of law, and have their master's consent. To suppose that in such circumstances they will not exert themselves to procure the conveniences and comforts of life, in the same manner as other civilized people, is to deny them the attributes of human nature. But there are many particular instances in the colonies to contradict the fact; and in North America many planters have emancipated their slaves, and afterwards hired them to work by the day or piece, and found their advantage in it. The colliers in Scotland have been lately freed, to the mutual benefit of master and servant. But indeed the objection is a mere conjecture, for very few have ever been freed in the West-Indies, on which the observation could be properly made.

Object. 45. Free negroes are miserable.

Answ. 45. Hitherto free negroes have had no proper rank in society, nor any fixed employment.
Those who are freed are generally concubines or favourites, who are not always the fittest persons to be made free; and they generally are oppressed and ill treated, for want of a patron or protector. Therefore, no deduction can be drawn from any observation made on them at present. But there are accidental instances of some, who, having been freed, have done themselves and their country credit. Nor can this assertion be maintained, but by those who deny them the participation of one common nature, which in every nation, in the same circumstances, leads to the same conduct.

Object. 46. Theft is lightly punished in the colonies.

Answ. 46. Not always. I have myself seen such instances of punishment on bare suspicion, as would make humanity shudder. But what must be the heart of that man, who can punish with severity a wretch, breaking a cane, or stealing to satisfy satisfy that hunger, which his parsimony has occasioned. Indeed the breaking of canes in my time, was a kind of high treason, to be punished with particular severity.

Object. 47. Planters are misrepresented; therefore probably Guinea captains are so likewise.

Answ. 47. If the planter’s own conscience condemns him not, we bring not his character into the question. Without quoting names, cruel facts are alleged as connected with slavery. But the reputations of planters and Guinea captains, are not touched on. There are good men in both lines. It is the oppression and murder of friendless Africans, for which the publick attention is claimed.

Object. 48. A profit is drawn from the slaves sold to foreigners. The French at Martinico have paid as high as £60 for a new slave.

Answ. 48. Here the interests of the slave merchant and of the planter disagree. French planters particularly, not having much interest-money to pay, and managing their own plantations, can allot more of their produce to the increase of their stock, and give higher prices than our planters are willing to spare from their own personal expenses. The French planter does not, any more than the English, make an ordinary interest of his money by the purchase of new slaves; but he prefers this method of appropriating his income to that of spending it on his own personal indulgencies. The high prices at Martinico may be accounted for from the encouragement given to those, who carry slaves to Hispaniola, which draws the principal trade thither. But it can only take place in particular cases, for no new slave can ever be worth so high a price, for the cultivation of the sugar cane, and that island needs but few supplies.

Object. 49. If profitable for the French to buy, why not for us?

Answ. 49. The French islands being more fertile than ours, can bear a more expensive cultivation; and their slaves being better fed and clothed, though unproductive, are not so much so as our slaves. Of 800,000 slaves imported into St. Domingo in 96 years preceding 1774, there remained 140,000 Creoles, or one Creole from six Africans. Our whole number of Creoles would not be perhaps in the proportion of one from 12 Africans imported into our colonies.

Object. 50. The French having no longer a competition with us, will buy their slaves cheap if we abandon the trade.

Answ. 50. In all settled trades the profit soon becomes to be nearly equally distributed among all those who are concerned in it. Every workman and broker, through whose hands any article passes, will each man have a share of the advantage, and proportion his expenses and rate of living accordingly. Hence, when an article has been once settled at a certain price, it can hardly ever be reduced back to its original cost, even when that circumstance is removed, which first occasioned the rise. The tax on glass is said to have been been doubled on the consumer. 'Repeal the tax, the price would not be diminished in proportion, the workman will not give up his extra day at the ale-house, nor the merchant his country feat. Slaves, besides the expenses of the ship, which are £8 more, now cost in goods, on the coast of Africa, at a medium about £18. Passing through a variety of hands from the inland countries, in each of which a profit must be left, any reduction of price on the coast must make slaves a losing bargain, therefore the reduction of the price will counterbalance the want of competition. A manufacturer, who loses part of his customers, produces goods only sufficient to supply his lessened demand, and must try to lay a higher price on them, to make up for the loss of his former trade. But if we can shew that the slave trade is at best precarious, and often a losing trade, should the demand for slaves only change hands from us to the French, then will the French only extend a losing traffic. If the demand be lessened, then will the slave-brokers quantum of profit be lessened, which the present state of the trade will not bear. This leaves us to conclude, that the French cannot draw great advantages from our abandoning the trade to them.

Obser. 51. If we give up the trade, the French will extend their share of it.

Answ. 51. Suppose that others successfully rob and murder on the highway, must we join the lawless band. At present, the French buy many slaves on the coast from our brokers. Our goods pay for them, our factories accommodate them. Stop these channels, and the French cannot at once once easily supply the goods, or procure the slaves. To us it is (by the acknowledgment of men well acquainted with the trade, when they have not a particular point to carry) a precarious, and on the whole, a losing trade. Did one company carry it on, that company must become bankrupt. But their present share has so few allurements for their own merchants, that their government offers a bounty to English ships to be employed in it under French papers for the settlement of new lands in St. Domingo. Our merchants are now engaged under false papers to carry it on. Still the French planter complains of the hardship imposed on him by the advanced price of slaves. Therefore, if the French extend their trade, they will extend their loss, especially of seamen, which extraordinary as ours (see introd.) is, greatly exceeds our proportion.* In the mean time, it is a subject of discussion for government, to determine how far an eagerness for lucre may be indulged in our traders, when directed to the improvement of a rival colony, with a view to the establishment of a marine, though at the expense of the individual planters who push it on. In another point of view, if the subject be properly proposed, may we not suppose the French as capable as we are of being influenced by sentiments of humanity and justice?

Object. 52. France has opened a trade for slaves from Mozambique, instead of giving up the Guinea trade, we should follow them thither, and come in for our share.

* May we not suppose that these allurements are thrown out to our traders, in order to save their own men and ships from the destruction caused by this horrid trade.
Answ. 52. Can no villany be committed on the face of the globe, but we must long to be a party? Such is the loss of lives in this trade, from the change of climates, and the length of the voyage, that though the slaves be purchased for a mere trifle, they find little encouragement to continue in it. But before we engage, it will be wise in us to provide ourselves with sublimate, as is the practice among the French, quietly to poison the unhappy wretches, when from the length of the voyage water or provisions begin to fail. This the French avow as a less shocking method of committing necessary murder, than throwing them overboard alive, as our Collingwood did in the voyage to Jamaica.

Objecr, 53. This abolition will raise disputes on the coast of Africa with the French.

Answ. 53. The limits of our factories are established. Where the French hitherto have not been permitted to buy slaves, they cannot expect to be indulged to the hindrance of our traffic in wood, gums, ivory, gold, &c. From their want of factories, they cannot extend theirslave-trade. If the minds of the natives be once pre-occupied in favour of the barter trade, they will not allow slave-brokers to pass, but at an expense, which the trade cannot bear. Perhaps the Dutch, Danes, and Portuguese, may be induced to follow our example. Then the slave trade could not be carried on to any great extent.

Objecr. 54. Slaves will be smuggled in from other islands to ours.
Answ. 54. Not at present, because our planters living in England cannot afford to give as high prices as foreigners give. Our planters now do not, or cannot, buy what they think the necessary supplies at the present advanced price; and if they did buy them, according to Long, they would find them an unprofitable purchase. Smuggled negroes cannot cost less than 20 per cent. above the present rate; how will our planters be able to afford this? But when smuggling is discovered, it may easily be prevented; it is not now necessary to suppose it. It cannot take place in the present relative circumstances of our and foreign colonies.

Object. 55. The trade is an extensive market for our manufactures.

Answ. 55. We should blush to think, that in order to make it profitable, we are obliged to cheat the poor Africans with damaged goods, and false measure; (see Newton’s Thoughts on the Slave-trade). Every man who argues for such a trade, argues for the basest treachery and fraud that ever were perpetrated. If this trade were stopped, our present fair trade in the staple commodities of Africa, might be indefinitely extended. The whole export is estimated within £800,000 collected from a number of adventurers, often as the last push, in hopes of a lucky hit, like a ticket in the lottery, to save them from bankruptcy. Of this a considerable part is bartered for staple articles, as wood, ivory, &c. and full one-third is said to be East-India and Venetian goods. This estimate is checked by the number of slaves purchased by our traders on the coast. That number annually annually is about 40,000, which, at £18 per head, is only £720,000. The expenses of the voyage are £8 more, which are charged on those sold to the planter.

Object 56. Guinea captains, surgeons, and officers, alone gain annually £50,000 in this trade, and one particular dealer in Guinea ships made an immense fortune.

Answ. 56. These are almost all the people who make money in the trade. The captain and officers by their privilege slaves, who never die, and their commission on the cargo, must always make money. The dealer in ships alluded to, had a great number in the trade, and stood his own insurfer in a lucky period.*

Object 57. Slaves once brought down from the inland parts of Africa must be exported to prevent them from being murdered.

Answ. 57. Could the trade be stopped in a moment, the abolition should at once take place. But as numbers for many months must continue to be brought down to the coast, it will require some management to confine their sale to our own islands, should our planters be so much persuaded of their utility, as to put themselves to some inconveniences in order to purchase them, that they may not be passed to foreigners.

* A ship, on board which Mr. F. served, brought off 420 slaves from the coast. They lost about fifty, and the refuse slaves amounted to about thirty more. They sold some for 48 l. the lots for 43 l. The whole average was 37 l. Here then is apparently a prosperous voyage; the number of deaths moderate, and the average high. Yet, when expenses and loss of time were brought to an account, it was found to have turned out a losing voyage. What may be expected where perhaps a third of the slaves die in the passage?

Object. 58. Our planters have not credit to purchase slaves.

Answ. 58. This must not be urged by any planter residing in England; for if he thinks the purchase profitable, why allots he not his European expenses to this purpose?

Object. 59. The trade is a nursery for seamen.

Answ. 59. It is the very grave of seamen, destroying more than all our foreign trade besides, often losing by deaths, incurable diseases, &c. two-thirds of those employed in it; and in the proportion of about eight to one of those lost in the barter or wood trade on the same coast. See Clarkson's Impolicy of the Slave Trade, and Stanfield's Letters.

Object. 60. The West-Indian trade is most profitable to this country.

Answ. 60. Then why is every sugar factor trying all he can to shake off his connections with the sugar planters, or to confine them entirely to the sale of his sugars, and the shipping of his stores? Can any planter now borrow money on his West-Indian property, either to improve it, or pay off pressing demands? Has there not been more bankruptcies among capital houses connected with the sugar colonies, than in any other branch of trade? Nay, it will be found, that the slave-trader himself complains of the tardiness of the planter's payments. The connection is drawn so close between Great Britain and her sugar colonies, that a change in their relative situation must be left to the latter, when they shall chuse to put their threats in execution of submitting to the Americans or French. But their trade will never be generally profitable to Britain while they have a monopoly of her market, and are allowed a drawback for a fictitious exportation of sugar to be smuggled back into the country. The whole ordinary produce of our sugar colonies is not equal to the consumption of Great Britain and Ireland at a moderate price. This may be considered as proved; for though last year was an ordinary crop, yet is there now hardly any sugar on

* Anno 1787, though the crop was only about 160,000 hhs. and the demand has been so great, that in the month of April last there was no sugar left on hand; yet the drawback on sugar is stated in the custom-houses returns at 121,952. Now, as I believe hardly any sugar is originally purchased with a view to exportation, the planter has very little advantage from this drawback, while it enhances the price to the consumer, already raised too high by the monopoly granted of our market. It is confined perhaps entirely to those who enter the sugar for exportation: and that these entries are not always fair, I can only judge from this circumstance, that refined sugar has been bought near the coast better, and 2d in the pound cheaper, than in London. This sureely calls for examination. Our planters, as a valuable part of the community, deserve every possible consideration, and no change is to be attempted that pays not every reasonable attention to their interest; but it must injure their cause to mix it with that of smugglers, as in this of the drawback, or with that of bad citizens, as when they threaten to throw themselves into the arms of America or France. They should indeed vindicate themselves openly from having encouraged this threat, which their affected friends have industriously inflated, and which must operate to their disadvantage with every thinking man.
hand; and we are now paying a war price for that article.

Object. 61. Slaves must carry out dung in baskets, and bring canes home in bundles.

Answ. 61. Allot lands for grass, and one horse and cart will do the work of forty slaves.

Object. 62. In crop time, the whole gang, whatever be its number, must be employed in making of the sugar.

Answ. 62. Gangs of 220 slaves; others, not amounting to 100, are kept to the same work, with little difference in the quantity of sugar made, that may not be explained from other circumstances, as the situation of the mill for receiving the wind, &c. Here surely must be a waste of labour in the more numerous gang; because the other plantation work might also be carried on so as to make fewer slaves necessary at other times. The fact is, 140 or 160 slaves often cultivate as much land, and send as much sugar to market as 220 slaves. These last must therefore be ill managed.

Object. 63. Slaves must be kept at work, or under command, from dawn till late at night.

Answ. 63. What purpose this drawling method answers, but the indulgence of the caprice of avarice ill understood, cannot be discovered. Give them a task. They may rest in the heat of the day, and do twice their present work. But they must be better fed, and not be sent in the hour of rest two miles from home to pick grass for cattle.

Object. 64.
Object. 64. Slaves cannot be assisted by cattle.

Answ. 64. The plough might be used in a great proportion of cane land. But cattle may at least assist always in carrying out dung and bringing home canes, as is now done on particular plantations. But such is the avarice for sugar, that no grass lands are allotted for the support of cattle. Hence often at the beginning of a crop, the whole stock of cattle must be renewed at any price.

Object. 65. The state of slaves will not be improved by the planting of provisions.

Answ. 65. The culture of provisions is easier than that of canes. Plant them where canes pay not for the culture. Expense is saved; the slaves are more plentifully fed, and the remaining cane land is better dressed, and becomes more productive.

Object. 66. Slaves are such as have been condemned for witchcraft.

Answ. 66. This is a most unlucky objection to be produced. This custom, as far as we know, prevails only among the nations near the sea coast. So strict is the police, and so sensible are the people of their rights, that no slave can be sold by his master, nor any free man be enslaved, except to expiate some crime real or pretended. When therefore a master, or head man of a village, longs for powder or brandy, he feigns himself bewitched, and points out a particular slave, or some obnoxious free man as the witch. The accusation stands stands for proof. The poor wretch is doomed to be sold to some Liverpool harpy, who stands ready, with the price of iniquity in his hand, to seize him. But these make a very small proportion of the whole, and include not those forcibly enslaved and sold by the several kings and tyrants.

Object. 67. Negroes are sold for adultery.

Answ. 67. This is another very unlucky objection. A tyrant becomes dissatisfied with one of his wives, or prefers brandy, or some European commodity to her. She has her option to drink the red water, which is made rank poison, or consent to be sold. The fear of death gives the latter the preference. Sometimes a grandee gives his wives liberty to solicit thoughtless young men. In this case the gallant is sold. Thus the slave-trade becomes answerable for all the miseries that follow on the coast of Guinea on imputed crimes. Our traders first tempt them to accuse, and then take advantage of the accusation.

Object. 68. Provisions must be brought from Europe and America to feed the slaves.

Answ. 68. This unnatural state answers neither the purpose of profit or humanity. Slaves will never be well fed by grain brought from distant parts. In bad years, when the planter is least able to purchase it, it will be most wanted. In the best years, luxury will grudge the cost. In fact, slaves will never be well fed with such purchased grain; nor will they ever increase, till the lands they cultivate be made to support them.

Object. 69.
Object. 69. Slaves have sufficient provision ground.

Answ. 69. And, except in Jamaica, only Sunday to work it. But it is not generally true, either that they have sufficient ground, or that it is generally useful. A few prime slaves appropriate the best parts, and weakly slaves are thrust out, or have their provisions stolen. Hardly ever can they spare them to ripen. Provision ground will be useful only, when made, equally with cane land, the work of the whole gang under the overseer. Yet this most necessary part of plantation economy is almost wholly neglected, the manager thinking much once or twice in a season to examine into the state of it.

Object. 70. Most excellent orders are sent out by absent planters.

Answ. 70. Whatever be their tenour, they are always interpreted by the custom of the colonies, which is for severity and pinching. They are always supposed to mean, Send home as much sugar, and draw as few bills on them as possible. A gentleman for fourteen years had defied the happiness of his slaves, not revenue, to be considered. But asking his manager why his slaves did not increase under such orders, he received for answer, " they had been too hard worked, " and too ill fed?"

Object. 71. It is the planter's interest to treat his slaves well.

Answ. 71. Then his practice contradicts his opinion. Can it be his interest to allow his slave neither food nor rest? Are six ounces of flour, or five hours rest, sufficient refreshment for twenty-four hours? Can it be his interest to wear them out by inconsiderate fatigue, and in a few years be obliged repeatedly to renew his gang from the slave-market, rather than by discreet management to enable them to carry on his work, and raise up, without expense, successive generations of labourers for his profit. Indeed nothing is found more fallacious than such reasoning. It is the pressure of the moment that directs arbitrary power, not distant consequences.

Object. 72. The treatment of slaves should be regulated.

Answer. 72. Except in a very few points it is almost impossible for law to come between a master and his slave. A cruel or capricious man can tease and waste his slave in a thousand ways that law cannot check, nor authority reach. The Danes, indeed, have an effectual method in their islands, which has been enforced in several particular instances. The governor divests a cruel master of the management of his property, and sets humane people over it:—a custom truly worthy of imitation; and the only effectual method to secure proper treatment to the slaves.

Object. 73. Plantations cannot be supplied from the births.

Answer. 73. Nor will they, while the slave-market is considered as a better mode of recruiting them than that of population. But at present, many increase from the births in all the rice, tobacco, tobacco, and sugar colonies, from the casualty of a humane master, an easy manager, a careful manager’s wife, an attentive surgeon. This proves the strong bias in nature to increase where not checked by oppression; and it would universally be the case if humane and proper treatment were universal. Carlisle’s plantation in Antigua has been long overstocked from the births; and after doing the master’s own work, the slaves are employed in doing task-work for the neighbouring plantations.

Object. 74. Population is checked by an over proportion of males.

Answ. 74. More stress is laid on this objection than it can well bear. The decrease of slaves is not caused by the want of women, but the want of encouragement. This over proportion takes place only among African slaves, who are not prolific in the colonies, not from natural causes, but from chagrin, the want of necessaries, and encouragement. But their proportion cannot at present be very considerable, (see introduct.) The natural proportion of the sexes takes place among the Creoles, who are in sufficient numbers, if properly indulged and assisted, to overstock all our islands in a few years, without diminishing the present produce of sugar.

Object. 75. Slaves are not kidnapped by our traders, but culprits or prisoners of war.

Answ. 75. We do not say that any great proportion of them are now kidnapped by our traders; because as far as they can reach with their their boats the country is either desolated by former depredations, or is under such police as makes it rather dangerous; though it sometimes happens that we hear of a captain making what he calls a stroke, sweeping away as many freemen as he can overpower with his crew. But we say that the natives kidnap each other, and that criminals make but a very small proportion of the whole. That they are kidnapped is almost the universal answer from those brought into our colonies; nor can the numbers brought down to the coast be accounted for in any other manner. Evidence has been delivered in on the present question of kidnapping having been practised even in his sight who gave the testimony. But suppose them culprits or prisoners of war, are we then the executioners for African tyrants, or African judges? Are we to punish unfortunate wretches by the various deaths endured in our slave ships? Offer a Guinea captain, condemned for murdering his crew or his slaves, his life, on condition of being fettered and treated as a slave in the passage to the West-Indies, he would run for refuge to the gallows. Moore mentions a free negro offered to him for sale for stealing a tobacco pipe. If prisoners of war may be enslaved, why send we not our slave-traders to attend the Turkish and Russian armies, and provide ourselves there? It will be as just and proper, as to furb up wars in Africa for the purpose of making slaves.

Object. 76. Britain produces annually 2000 culprits. The negroe countries are forty times as large. They therefore may supply annually 80,000 culprits.

Answ.
Answ. 76. This supposes Africa equally civilized with Britain; for crimes are the offspring of civilization. Crimes exist not among savages. There must be laws and police to which they are to be referred. This, therefore, if true, cuts off another assertion, that the Africans are brutish. For among savages there can be no culprits. Society must be well advanced before a man can be considered as a criminal, and an object of justice. But how does our method of collecting slaves on the coast agree with this notion? Our traders should demand a certificate of the slave’s sentence, lest he take away an innocent person. The fact is, among imported slaves there exists no appearance of culprits: some are young girls not grown up; many boys under 14 years; they generally affirm themselves to have been kidnapped. If criminals, some of their old practices would now and then break out; but they are quiet, inoffensive people, guilty only of brooding over their unhappy state, or of stealing from a niggardly master to keep themselves from dying of hunger.

Object. 77. They are the children of women kept for breeding slaves.

Answ. 77. Then they would be sold when children; but the slave cargoes consist of all ages of both sexes, which have been kidnapped or enslaved in wars made on purpose to accommodate the dealers in this horrid traffic.

Object. 78. The king of Dahomy murders his people for his amusement, therefore we may traffic in slaves.
Answ. 78. This monster, from superstition, sacrifices his own people, and from avarice, enslaves and fells others. But the one passion, intermeddles not with the exertion of the other. Their operations are distinct. His avarice is encouraged by our traders, and renders numbers of his people wretched, in addition to those less unhappy people, who are the victims of his cruelty. By checking this inhuman trade, we should annihilate one half of the evil; by prosecuting it we are guilty of all the ills produced by it, and encourage his savage disposition.

Object. 79. The slaves are bought in open market, and the brokers will not disclose any particulars respecting their captivity.

Answ. 79. Do not our traders wink with their eyes, and avoid any close inquiry? But if they be ignorant how they are originally procured in the inland parts, how come they so well acquainted with the circumstances of their being the children of slave-breeders, prisoners of war, and culprits?

Object. 80. Slaves are well cared for on board the slave ships, and lose not above five in an hundred, in the passage from Africa to the West-Indies, which lasts for six weeks.

Answ. 80. Five in an hundred for six weeks is at the rate of forty-two in an hundred, or more than a two-fifths in twelve months. But suppose the passage lengthened out to seven, eight, ten, twelve weeks; (there has been an instance of a passage being sixteen weeks) will not the mortality increase increase in a much more rapid proportion than that of two-fifths in twelve months? And is not this actually the case, so that a tenth; a fifth, a fourth, nay, a third part, and sometimes half, is lost during the voyage? But allow in ordinary cases only five in an hundred to die on the passage; the slaves are all shipped in good health; when they come to market, from a tenth part to a third, or perhaps a half, are found to be diseased, and are sold as refuse, of which not more than one in three stand the seasoning. The voyage is therefore accountable not only for those that die on board ship, but for two-thirds of the refuse slaves which die in the West-Indies within the period of seasoning; therefore the loss of one-fourth part, or perhaps a third of the whole, may be charged to the voyage.

But where five men are stowed in the place of one, which is the difference between a slave ship and a transport for carrying troops, it is impossible that the wretches can be well cared for. This is proved even to demonstration in the accounts given of their horrid state by Mr. Falconbridge, Mr. Newton, and Mr. Stanfield. If so few be lost, how comes it that a slave trader cannot get insurance in London on his slaves at any rate; or, that those, who in one or two instances underwrote slaves at 25 per cent. premium, refused to continue the advantageous bargain.

But this extraordinary loss, which often happens in the voyage, is charged not to the infernal stowage of the slaves, but to other causes, as a long continuance on the coast, improper provisions, &c. Allow all this; it must first be proved that the Africans forced themselves on board their ships, and put themselves willingly into such a situation, situation, as was necessarily followed by this destruction. But if the trader forced them into this situation of hunger, thirst, disease, and death, he is as answerable for the fatal consequences, as if he had at once cut their throats. No man is allowed to plead one crime in excuse of another. The destructive consequences of enslaving them, is but a part of the original guilt connected with the commerce.

Object. 81. They are encouraged to rear children, and will not.

Answ. 81. Can they rear them for him, who demands bricks without straw, that they may be oppressed at his caprice? How few are put in the state, have food, clothes, or necessaries, to encourage them, or are indulged when pregnant, or when nurses? Can a young single lad, or a batchelor manager, as is now the growing custom to employ on plantations, have that fellow-feeling and sympathy with a child-bearing woman, that may be expected in a tender-hearted matron? I can recollect but one case, where slaves have increased under a bachelor. There some peculiarly favourable circumstances take place. Those acquainted with the usual treatment of slaves, may wonder how so many children are reared, rather than so few. Indeed, the ordinary causes of the increase of slaves on particular plantations, shew how easily population may be promoted.

Object. 82. Many slaves die in consequence of their following the superstitious rites of the Obiah or John Crow men.

Answ. 82.
Answ. 82. This superstition is confined to a few, and may be easily suppressed. Perhaps among 2000 or 3000 slaves, one may be heard of who has injured his health, by strolling six or eight miles in the night time to attend one of their dances. But it would be just as reasonable to send and bring off some of the natives of France to be made slaves, because a farmer may now and then get drunk at a fair, and break his neck, as it is to drag away Africans from their country, because their masters have resolved to keep those whom they have already enslaved in utter ignorance and brutality.

Object. 83. Negroe women are profligate, and destroy their fruit.

Answ. 83. This takes place among none but perhaps a few, that are suffered to work, or hire themselves out among seamen; nor are any effects produced by it that deserve to be noticed as a general observation. Negresses have the maternal character as strongly impressed on them as any other women; nor does it fail to act, except where the weight of oppression has made them callous to every natural feeling.

Object. 84. The number of Creoles, where the sexes only are in due proportion, is not equal to the support of the present stock.

Answ. 84. Denied, see Introduction. Our Creoles exceed two-thirds of our present number of slaves, but not more than two-thirds of the whole are employed in the culture of sugar, and that in a proportion, which Long says, they may continue to increase from the births. Every other department department may easily be supplied by white men or free negroes, and mulattoes. It must not be lost sight of, that few African women breed, and that no new slaves repay their cost, expense, and loss in seasoning. We cannot, therefore, suppose any future progeny of these capable of repaying the expense of such a purchase; and can expect a profitable recruit only from Creoles. But there are instances in every colony of humane treatment actually producing an increase. This will universally be the case, when the practice is universal.

Object. 85. Unhealthy situations require supplies.

Answ. 85. Can this be urged by any man pretenting to humanity or discretion? Abandon the cultivation of the cane, rather than sport with a brother's life. The unhealthiness of mines, &c. cannot be pleaded here, because worked by volunteers. But no plantation that requires supplies can repay the expense. We may still ask, Has every proper measure been adapted for the particular situation? Are the huts fixed in a dry airy spot? Are the slaves plentifully fed, discreetly worked, well defended with clothes against damps, or wet weather. Few situations are to be found that may not be corrected, so as that the human constitution shall adapt itself to it. But their manner of living must be that of proper inhabitants, drawing their sustenance from the lands they occupy, not artificial, as in a garrison, or used as beasts of burden, and pretended to be fed with grain brought from other quarters of the globe.

Object. 86.
Object. 86. Slavery is not unlawful; the bible allows of it.

Answ. 86. The use of money is not unlawful. But it is unlawful to rob on the highway to procure it. We meddle not with slavery in the abstract, but with the ordinary means of procuring slaves. We say men ought not to go to the coast of Africa to kidnap the natives, or to encourage them to kidnap each other; or to bribe them with baubles to go to war, to fight with and enslave each other; to turn every trespass into a cause for enslaving; to subject the unfortunate wretches to the miseries of a West-Indian voyage; to sell them to be half-starved, hard worked, and ill treated. Shew us slavery without these attendants, and we shall have little to object against it.

Christianity obliges us to instruct and inform the mind. Social liberty is the genuine consequence of improvement. Therefore we may say, that the Christian privilege favours liberty; and, while it avoids making any sudden change in established customs, it naturally tends towards it. See my Examination of Harris's Scriptural Researches.

Object. 87. The Jews were permitted to hold slaves.

Answ. 87. They might keep the children of the heathen, and their posterity slaves. But they were enjoined to treat them well, instruct them in their religion, and make them partakers of their religion and laws. The slaves were supplied with food and clothing from their six days labour, without being forced to work for this on Sabbath.
Sabbath. If the master struck out but a tooth, the slave was to be free. If he took a maid-servant to his bed, or gave her to his son, she had the privilege of a wife, and could not be sold. We must imitate the example of the Jews, if we claim their permission of holding slaves. But by the coming of our Saviour, all men are become brethren. A Jew could hold a Jew in service only for six years, and only such as were too poor to maintain themselves. Here we are to look for the spirit of the Jewish laws respecting slavery; not in their permission to make slaves of the Heathen around them. This indulgence was probably allowed, as divorces were, for the hardness of their hearts; but was, to be reclaimed, as it has been in fact, by the introduction of a more perfect law. We make the Africans poor by enslaving them. But we should keep them slaves only for six years, and then dismiss them well-supplied with necessaries. Farther, the Jews themselves were numerous in a small country. Their slaves must, therefore, have been few. Among those who returned from their captivity, there was but one slave to six Jews; perhaps one servant to each family.

Object. 88. Slavery renders oppression necessary. See Niger in Publick Advertiser of March 12.

Answ. 88. But what except avarice renders slavery necessary; and can oppression, if it be the necessary consequence of a vice, be in any degree or shape vindicated? Murder is often the necessary consequence of passion. Is murder therefore to be excused? What an opening is here for crimes and villany of every sort. The existence of
of this oppression is candidly acknowledged by a Jamaica planter in his observations on the slave trade.

Object. 89. Free negroes and mulattoes do not increase from the births.

Answ. 89. It is not true: many instances to the contrary might be produced. But it is also true, that no race or rank of men will continue to increase, except where the means of living are in abundance. Those here described, are exceedingly fettered between white men on the one side, and slaves on the other, for the means of subsistence. Therefore they cannot expand themselves. It is so with the native white people in St. Kitt's; their marriages are prolific, but from the want of subsistence, the old families have insensibly vanished, and every year takes from the population of the colony.

Object. 90. A compensation must be made to Planters for 60 millions of property, which the abolition of the slave trade will annihilate.

Answ. 90. It will be time enough to think of compensation when the loss has been sustained. Even then I should protest against the claims of such West-India appraisements, as I have been acquainted with. Yet no planter, not already ruined, will suffer by the abolition. Compensation would defeat every purpose aimed at, for procuring good treatment to the slaves. Many planters find their affairs irrecoverable. If they hurry not on their fate, from the hopes of compensation, at least they will be careless less of the issue. Their former inconsiderate conduct will continue, perhaps will be sharpened, to enhance their demand.

If there be a planter, who has fed his slaves well, and worked them considerately, has indulged them with proper rest, has clothed them properly, has furnished necessaries for the encouragement of population, has lived with them, has treated them as fellow-creatures, has made the support of his plantation his prime object, and been contented with that revenue which this attention would admit of; in the name of justice let him be liberally compensated. But such a character so circumstanced, so unsuccessful, is not to be found. The need of compensation is a sure proof he deserves it not. Again, let it be observed, that he claims this compensation because he is prevented from buying African slaves, which, even in Long's opinion, would only more involve him.

But if a man has separated himself from his property, has drawn a revenue to support at a distance an expensive establishment, from a property not equal to such demands, or which perhaps itself wanted supplies; if, to force out this revenue, his half-starved slaves have been incessantly worked; if necessaries for the encouragement of population have been withheld, and the assistance of cattle has been refused; let not this man come to government to make up a loss arising from the cravings of luxury, or the inconsiderate use of power. In this class will be found every planter who has ruined himself by speculating in sugar plantations. Mere adventurers cannot claim compensation, for they are where they they set out. Their creditors have no claim; for they took the chance of their success.

Object. 91. The trade should be regulated, not abolished.

Answ. 91. Regulate murder as you please; it still remains murder. Suppose a regulation. It must check the mode of loading the slave-ships.
But at present, with every contrivance in the shipmaster’s power, it is on the whole a los-ningtrade; it depending on circumstances, whether a particular ship makes a saving voyage. Regulations, which shall make it more expensive, will make that loss certain, which is now contingent.
Therefore, while holding out indulgence, they will occasion a greater loss, than the abrupt abo-ton of it. Regulations suppose the trade honest and proper, and only abused in the management of it. But we affirm the very principle to be wrong, and every attempt in it iniquitous and unjust. To propose a law for regulating smuggling, would not be so absurd. We can explain the unreasonableness of the proposition, only by supposing parliament to enact a rule by which highwaymen should be guided, in robbing and murdering in the way of their profession.

But what regulations can be enacted in Britain, that shall take effect 1200 miles inland in Africa, that shall stop the murderer’s hand, or save the devoted village; that shall in the thirsty desert offer the refreshing draught to the fainting captive, or save him from the hungry tyger, when abandoned to death in the inhospitable forest? Every possible regulation will be a mere mockery of the woe we affect affect to commiserate. The friend of humanity must spurn the proposition from him, which would only rivet more firmly on Africa this galling chain, while it gave the sanction of law to a commerce that humanity must deplore, that policy cannot defend.

But the regulations will be accepted with a design to evade them. In this case, the Legislature becomes answerable for the oppression and murder connected with this trade.

CONCLUSION.

If the subject be discussed, the trade will be found so iniquitous, that it cannot be left on its present footing, or be possibly regulated. Let the abolition then take place on the broad basis of humanity, justice, and sound policy. All particular circumstances will easily accommodate themselves to the new situation of things.
POSTSCRIPT.

I SHOULD be ungrateful to pass over the candour of the author of the Considerations on Emancipation, &c. to myself. He has laid me under very great obligations, by stepping forward to vindicate my reputation from the many horrid charges brought against me by my former adversaries; especially, for clearing me of the crime of cruelty to my slaves, which has been circulated in every company where slavery has been agitated, and mentioned with as much abhorrence, as if no man besides me had been unfeeling in his treatment. He will allow me to observe, that that irritation, which he makes the alloy of my temper, cannot be intolerable, if it permits me to be affectionate in my family, easy to my slaves, and charitable to the poor; for to these the natural temper is least under disguise. He indeed takes out the sting, by charging my disputes to the pique and prejudice of my enemies. I may add, among those praised in my Essay, are some, who were then my inveterate foes. He will also indulge me in correcting his mistake concerning the M. Reviewers. Far from censoring injurious epithets in my writings, they blamed their want of warmth. From their late conduct I have only learned, that to utter false criminal libels against Mr. R. in low vulgar language, is decent moderate conduct in his adversaries; but it is abuse for him to use the most cautious terms in his own vindication.*

* These praises have encouraged Mr. Tobin in pursuit of what he calls "solid pudding," to raise at present a third
But p. 36. I am charged with misrepresentation. If he will peruse my Essay, he will see I prevent the conclusion of indiscriminate ill-treatment of slaves, by observing, that arbitrary power in the master has not all those ill consequences with which sensibility is apt to charge it. And if this, and many passages of like import, be not sufficient to excuse me, I cheerfully embrace this opportunity of declaring, that the nature of slavery, not the disposition of the master, is chargeable with the enormities connected with this debasing state. Planters are as capable of, and as often exert the benevolent affections as any other set of men. But during the period which I spent among them, a slave was not considered as an object of sympathy, or intitled to the regards of humanity. His services were accepted with the same indifference that we express towards a clock that keeps time; his faults were punished with the rigour that is exerted towards a dangerous rival, whom chance fine on the publick from the abuse of an insignificant individual. And as no new crime could be easily framed for me, he sets himself to feign what I am to think. He and his party are welcome to all the advantage they can draw from this conduct. I have no right to complain. I gave him liberty, if he would not confound the claims of the Africans, my clients, with my character, to cut and mangle it at his pleasure. This he has most religiously observed; for not one argument in the planters favour interrupts the torrent of his personal abuse. I take this opportunity to thank him for his truly excellent advice; and I pray that it may be recommended by his example.

In return, I propose that he cherish in his own conduct a rule of morality a little more comprehensive than he prescribes for me, when he supposes, that after calling me traitor, oppressor, an enemy to man, a hypocrite towards God, implacable, revengeful, (see his several libels) he does not charge me with the "slightest criminality," or any thing derogating from "a moral or religious character." has brought within our power, who may possibly escape, and if we let slip the present occasion, effect our ruin. But he allows that there is occasion for censure, and that my book contains many truths, which he wishes, for the honour of human nature, he could deny. Where then is the necessity or use of misrepresentation? Indeed, if it were not an invidious task, every circumstance in it might be referred to individuals, probably well known to this gentleman. I hope this is the last time I shall have occasion to mention myself, on a subject, that ought not to be blended with the reputation of its advocates. But as I am tired of being obliged to carry about with me proofs of the innocency of my character, to vindicate it from the calumny cast upon it by men of rank and consideration, in every company, where my private interest can be hurt, or the cause in which I am engaged, injured; and as this work may come into hands, which these considerations may not reach, I trust I shall stand excused with the publick for inserting from them here my own eulogium, mixed as it is with irritation of temper, and misrepresentation of facts.
EXTRACT from CONSIDERATIONS on the Emancipation of Negroes, and on the Abolition of the Slave Trade, by a West-India Planter, page 34, &c.

"HAVING introduced the name of this writer, (Mr. Ramfay) without whose labours the subject of slavery would not probably have been so much agitated at this day, I cannot dismiss him without farther mention, as well as to rescue his character from unmerited reproach, as to caution his readers against the exaggerations of his pen. As a husband and father he was affectionate and provident. As a pastor, decent, pious, temperate, and exemplary. As a master of slaves, so far was he from indulging in the exercise of cruelty, that he was remarkably abstemious in the use of discipline, even on necessary occasions. He was charitable to the poor, and punctual in his pecuniary transactions. His good qualities were many; but at the same time, his temper was prone to irritation; and if not absolutely vindictive, he was at least extremely liberal in the use of injurious epithets, as appears from his writings, which have drawn on him the correction of the learned Journalist, under whose review they have passed, though otherwise sufficiently disposed to favour his cause.

"Unfortunately his book was written during a state of warfare with his parishioners; a contest unprovoked, it must be allowed by any act on his part, inconsistent with the character of a good man, but suggested by pique, and prosecuted by party, on the other side. However, he has combined his own injuries with the injuries of the slaves, and given scope to his resentment, while he appears an advocate in the cause of humanity. This his book contains a great many truths, I wish, for the honour of human nature, I could deny. Where authority exists, it is too apt to be abused. Slavery therefore necessarily supposes such a state of oppression and consequent abasement, as is unpractised among the free orders of society, and for a good reason, because it is untolerated. But to suppose those oppressions either so frequent, or severe as they are charged to be, would certainly be to give too great a degree of credit to his misrepresentations.

N. B. Page 40, he allows with me that French slaves are better clothed and better fed than English slaves; a truth, which has been disputed with me.
